Is Man Inherently Warlike

A distinguished orator, many years ago, in speaking of the warlike nature of the human race, made some remarks which seem to be as appropriate today as when they were issued. He declared; "There were splendid Damascus blades when plowing was done with a crooked stick. There were complete suits of armor on backs that never felt a shirt. The world was full of inventions to destroy life before there was any to prolong it or make it endurable. Murder was always a science - medicine still has a long way to go. The destroyers have always been honored; the useful have always been despised." However, the twentieth century has seen science make great strides, which is why civilized people deplore this tendency. A plane in the sky, in many parts of the world today, is not a boon to mankind - a vehicle for rapid transportation - but potentially a great destructive force to spread terror on those below. The human race has still a great distance to go on the road to civilization.

A true democracy is the farthest step forward in the progress of civilized man. Its success depends upon the character, information and intelligence of the people who compose it. The world will progress as and if people learn to reason and to think for themselves and permit their own inherently fine instincts to govern their behavior, both as individuals and as members of society.

Parody on "Tenting Tonight"

Wer're camping tonight at an auto camp;
Give us a pillow, please;
Our weary forms a chance to stretch
Out underneath the trees.
Many are the bugs that are buzzing tonight,
Waiting for a chance to light;
Many are the hearts longing for their beds
Where they can sleep at night.
R. C. O'Brien
